I was pleased to hear that the NIEHS is finally considering phasing out lethal animal testing. I feel that if in-vitro testing or any other non-animal testing can be used it should be. It would seem much more technical, reliable, cost efficient, not to mention the countless animals that would not have to physically suffer with these out-dated poison tests. We live in a much more technical computer futuristic society. Let's bring medical research up-to-date. Thank you.
